Defining Goal

1 Why do you want this goal so bad?

I want to become a proficient Front-end or Back-end Developer, or perhaps a Full Stack Web Developer, because I truly enjoy creating something useful for everyone. Additionally, when tasks become more challenging, I become even more passionate about solving the problems. Completing tasks perfectly gives me a sense of self-satisfaction. Once I become an expert in that field, I intend to share my knowledge with others.

In the next 6-12 months, my goals are as follows: firstly, I aim to graduate from college with top grades. Subsequently, I aspire to secure a permanent position in the technology industry as a Front-end or Back-end Developer, or even as a Full Stack Web Developer. Following that, I plan to continue my education to earn a bachelor's degree. I also have the intention of establishing a learning community for friends in need, particularly in the field I specialize in.

Knowing Yourself

4 What are the negative self concepts that I have:

Self Concept 1

I can't possibly be like them, they already have a deep understanding of something.

Self Concept 2

I will struggle to apply for jobs; there are too many people with skills superior to mine.

Self Concept 3

I feel that the work I've created isn't good enough to showcase to others.

5 My strategies to change my self concept to be better

Strategy 1

Stop comparing yourself to them, start consistently learning that thing regardless of how far along we are.

Strategy 2

Begin enhancing self-skills, take skill-specific classes or bootcamps in your field, create your own portfolio, and seek as much experience as possible.
